1) Do you always know exactly what you're going to get? How do you know? Is it convenient and easy?
2) Do you always know what store you're going to go to? How do you know? Do you typically go to the same stores?
3) Have you ever used a physical grocery list? Why do/don't you use one now?
4) Have you ever used a grocery list app? Why do/don't you use one now?
5) What would it take for you to want to use one? Is there any exceptional, far-off, or even seemingly impossible feature that would convince you?
6) Do you ever shop with other people, or for other people? How do you coordinate? Is it reliable?
7) What is your favorite thing about shopping, and least favorite?

9/30:

Vishnu:

1) I know the necessities. I may get more, but I know my bare minimum. I use a to-do app. It is convenient and easy.
2) I don't know, it depends on if I can get transport or not, it is largely out of my control.
3) I used a physical list once.
4) I don't, because it doesn't have enough features to convince me to download a separate app. My to-do list has a checklist, which is good enough.
5) A price comparison between stores, or if it told me where in the store items are.
6) Yes, I just add it to the list with little brackets to know it's for them, and it is reliable.
7) My favorite thing is walking around the store and seeing all the options. My least favorite thing is trying to find something, and I can't find it or it's not even there, although it doesn't happen that often.

Vishnu is content with having his basic to-do list, which has a checklist, and its all he needs for shopping. However, if he had an app that told him which store would get him a better deal, or where items are, he would consider another app.

Konrad:

1) Yes, but I may buy a few extra things if I spot them. I write them down in my phone messages app to myself. It is convenient and easy.

2) Yes, I decide based on what I need, and I may need to go to several stores.
3) Maybe, but not any time recently.
4) No, because I don't need any more features than just writing down a list like I do in my messages app.
5) I don't think there would be any feature that would convince me. Maybe if it had automatic discounts without any real intervention from me.
6) Yes, I just read their text. It is reliable.
7) My favorite thing about shopping is driving there and back. My least favorite is navigating through the store.

Konrad is not very keen on downloading more than the bare minimum in terms of apps. He has no problem with the current way of doing things, and unless it gave him discounts with no effort, he would not consider downloading anything new.

10/5:

Ela:

1) Yes, I know what I like. At certain stores, such as the Farmer's Market, I will get exactly the same thing, while sometimes, for example at Whole Foods, I will make a list but then see something that I've been needing and buy it.
2) Yes, I know when I need certain things I need to go to certain stores, since I know what products are at certain stores. I never buy everything all at one store.
4) No, I don't see the need for it, I just write it down and it's good enough. I'm not that good with technology.
5) I don't think so, but maybe if it provided health information that I could learn from, then it could be worth it. For example, if I want to be low carb, it could help me choose products that are low carb.
6) Yes, I do, and I just use my regular messages, they sent me a list of what I should buy.
7) My favorite thing is buying healthy food, and my least favorite is when there's too many people and long lines.

Extra) I might not have time to go to multiple stores sometimes.

Ela generally knows what to buy already, and has a routine in place. However, she is interested in learning more about the health of her products.

Greg:

1) I have an idea of what I will buy, but I don't know everything yet, when shopping I might see something interesting and buy it.
2) Yes, I always go to the same stores, and the exact store I go to depends on what is needed.
3) I don't use physical lists anymore, because we use phones to text what we need.
4) No, because it is not necessary.
5) Not for groceries, but if it told me what to buy in terms of replacing parts to something, it could be helpful and save me time.
6) Yes, we text what we need, and it works well.
7) I don't like shopping that much, but I like that we get the food we need. It does however feel like it takes a while.

Greg also is not very interested in an app, and the system he uses works well. However, he suggests that for handyman-type jobs, he could use an app that very simply tells him what he needs to purchase without having to go through all the research.

Donta:

1) Yes. If it's not too much, I just remember, otherwise I write down a list.
2) Depends. But, mostly yes.
3) No, it's not modern enough.
4) No, I use Apple Notes and it works well/it's convenient.
5) A coupon generator would be helpful.
6) We text, and there is normally no issue.
7) My favorite thing is to walk around, see things, and talk a little bit with whoever I'm shopping with, and my least favorite is that without a car, it can be difficult sometimes.

Donta is also content with what he uses, and would only consider using an app like this if it saved him money (gave him coupons).

Overview:

Overall, it seems people have little interest in a grocery list app, and would only consider downloading one if it saved them money in some way. There are also some other interests, like health and part replacement.
